The author gives a quotation from John Stuart Mills, excusing his retired mode of life thus: "General Society as now carried on in England son rather than the pleasure it affords." He goes on to say that all serious discussion on matters on which opinions differ as considered all-bred, and that as the English are as a nation deficient in liveliness and sociability they cannot talk agreeably on trifles, in which art the French excelled. The author takes umbrage at this, which he calls a "charge of social retrogression," saying that " superiority of the French of the last century implies the inferiority of all nations of the present." He quotes De Tocqueville and Madame de Stael as making in substance the same statements as Mill. He speaks in detail of the famous Parisian parlors, which for nearly two centuries, were brilliant with the wit and learn-The proceedings consisted of an address to the Leg. ing of the ablest men and women of France, and it might almost be said of Europe. Then scarcely one man in ten could read. Newspapers were at a very low ebb, there was no telegraph and little commercial intercourse or foreign travel, and the conversation of authors, artists, statesmen, diplomatists and generals was reported abroad for the benefit of monarchs, nobles and literary men. The author goes on to say that as books and pathat, although they talked less, yet in proportion " Resolved. It seems to me that the author aimest proves the opposite of what he intends, for how do we attain a high degree of culture in any art but by the constant exercise of that art; and, therefore, as people do not talk so much, it is fair to infer that they do not talk so well. When the statements of such a writer as John Stuart Miff, a man distinguished for acute-ness of perception and depth of thought, are attributed to a "lack of consideration" it would hardly be too severe a criticism to say that the writer himself is guilty of the same fault.
